Candles still feature prominently in homes today and the making of candles is a therapeutic and enjoyable process for individuals or for groups. In this book, the author presents some key candle-making techniques, and shows the reader how to achieve beautiful and intricate results with just a few key materialsincluding ice! There are twenty projects to try, of varying levels of difficulty, and even advice at the end of the book for how to wrap and gift your beautiful handmade candle. Making Candles is a simple, accessible yet definitive guide to creating your own pillars, tapers and floating candles.

Great book, really informative. A must for all candlemaking. Also went to one of Sarah's classes which was a really enjoyable day * Customer * Brought this as a gift for a friends birthday after her mentioning that she wanted to have a go at making her own, but after having a sneaky flick through I kept it for myself! Purchased the basics mentioned in the book and yesterday I made my first candle! The Mason glass one, and I have to say I'm very impressed. The book is idiot proof and highlights ability level for each candle so I'd say this book is great for first timers as well as people that have done it before as there are quite a few tricky ones too. Can't wait to make more this weekend, I'm looking at empty jars in a whole different way and saving a few quid as I often buy candles but can make my own now! * customer *About the AuthorSarah Ditchfield started making candles in her kitchen after her husband bought her a kit for Christmas. She then started organizing candle-making evenings at her home, and this led to a string of commissions from restaurants, hotels and independent shops. She also began selling candles across the UK and overseas, and her English Rose candles even went with some of the British Forces to Afghanistan. In 2012 Sarah and her husband launched Candle by Parties (candle-making birthday parties) for children, which developed into events for schools as well as adult parties, including hen nights, Bar Mitzvahs, Womens Institute groups, anniversaries and Diwali festivals. In 2013 they had their first big corporate event for a pharmaceutical company and since then they have not looked back. Now trading as Candle by Events, they run company ice-breaker sessions, team-building and family fun days and have recently been asked to run an event in Los Angeles for a group of 400. Sarah has also demonstrated candle making at the Country Living Fair in London, UK.
